White spot disease confirmed in Louisiana

White spot disease (WSD) has been confirmed by the National Veterinary Services Laboratory (NVSL) in a quarantined crawfish pond in St. Martin Parish, Commissioner of Agriculture and Forestry Bob Odom announced in early May.

The pond was quarantined in late April after Department of Agriculture and Forestry animal health officials and aquaculture specialists from the LSU AgCenter suspected WSD was causing crawfish in the pond to die.

"This disease is reportable to the USDA and the international animal health organization. It could have major economic impacts on Louisiana's aquaculture industry," Odom said. "We are quarantining the pond to prevent the spread of the disease to other ponds and wild crustacean populations."

WSD, caused by the white spot syndrome virus or the white spot virus, affects crustaceans including shrimp, prawns, crawfish, lobster and crabs. It can greatly reduce production and has caused mortality rates of 100 percent in farmed shrimp. WSD is not a threat to humans and poses no known human health risk.

Odom said his agency is working with USDA, the LSU AgCenter and the Department of Wildlife and Fisheries to prevent further spread, detect the source of the disease, and notify pond owners and fishermen.

"We will be working in the coming days to find out how the disease got here and testing neighboring ponds for infection," Odom said.

Louisiana Department of Wildlife and Fisheries' Secretary Bryant Hammett advised fishermen who harvest wild crawfish in the Atchafalaya Basin to be mindful of this disease and report any suspicious looking crawfish to their local Wildlife and Fisheries office.

This first confirmed case of WSD was detected when a crawfish producer in Arnaudville noticed die off in his pond and notified an AgCenter aquaculture specialist who took samples from the pond. The samples were tested by LSU and also Texas A&M University. The USDA's lab confirmed the samples were positive for WSD.

Similar occurrences were noticed in some Vermilion Parish ponds and additional samples have been sent to the NVSL in Ames, Iowa, for testing.

"We just received the results on the first confirmation and are working diligently on a plan to protect pond and wild crawfish. Our greatest concern is keeping this disease contained. The crawfish industry alone in Louisiana is valued at $95.6 million. We can't afford to have a disease like this in our state," Odom said.

Aquaculture and animal health officials from LDAF, the Department of Wildlife and Fisheries, the AgCenter and the USDA will meet later this week to structure a protocol for handling the disease.

According to Wildlife and Fisheries and the LSU AgCenter, shrimp and crabs are valued at more than $176 million.
